

Nicholas Wright – Unemployment

Nicholas was really awesome. He was confident and knowledgeable, and spoke in a detailed yet down to earth manner. He was able to communicate a good deal of information but in an accessible way; I feel like I understand unemployment much better after hearing his lecture! He was also funny and gracious, doing an excellent job of laying out the course of his lecture at the beginning and addressing his Jamaican accent with humor. He also handled questions from the viewing professors remarkably well, deferring them to more appropriate times or elaborating when necessary. I would certainly take a course from him and would absolutely recommend him to friend, he has the makings of an outstanding instructor!

Nicholas A. Wright

Nicholas probably approached his presentation more like an educator than any of the other presenters have. Every statement made by him was toward the class rather than towards the professors sitting in. He appears to be confident in his own knowledge of the material that he is covering. He moves through the presentation at his own pace and still takes the time to address questions while doing so. Also he branched out and defined any other term that was mentioned and how it relates to unemployment. Overall his presentation was very solid and I would definitely consider taking a class taught by him. Even though he has a pretty strong accent he made sure to make all of his statements very clear and used his power point at points of confusion for the audience but didn't go word for word. Most importantly he didn't allow the audience to speed him up: he kept control of his class. For it to be unemployment at a glance, he covered all of the necessary points and tied everything together nicely and clearly. For these reasons I would comfortably refer a student to his course. Overall I feel that he would be a good instructor.

Presenter Name: Nicholas A. Wright

Topic: unemployment.

This person was funny and interesting to listen to. I would definitely take for my class. I would also recommend this instructor to all of my friends. I followed this instructor from the beginning to end. At first I had difficulty understanding him but after five minutes it was all clear. Knowing the materials doesn't make a good professor. It's about the teaching style too. I feel like he knows how to keep student engaged. I was paying attention every single moment because it was so interesting. I love the way he was answering the questions. He was the only who was confident and accurate out of the four presenter that I listen to. His presentation was clear. He also listed the things we should know before this lecture and things we will learn from this lecture which makes it easy for students to learn. I understood everything he was explaining about unemployment. I feel like he did better than any other lecturer on explaining the materials. He kept students engaged throughout the lecture. He would definitely be a good professor because he has the ability to explain things. I would definitely take him for any of my economics class.

Unemployment

Nicholas Wright did an excellent job teaching us about his topic which was unemployment. I would definitely take him as an instructor because he was very clear in his presentation. A major reason, I would want to take him is because I enjoyed how he was able to make us laugh every once in a while. This was important because making us laugh kept us very engaged in his presentation which in turn only helped us understand his presentation a little bit better. For the same reason I would also recommend this instructor to a friend. Even if my friend did not know much the topic of unemployment, I feel like Nicholas would do a good job of explaining the topic. I was able to follow the lecture material and learn a lot from his presentation. Although, I felt like I knew a lot about unemployment from what I have learned in my classes over the years, he was able to learn a lot about the new stuff that I already did not know. I can also say that I understood him rather clearly. Although he had somewhat of an accent, he did not really let it come in the way of his presentation, and it was good that he addressed it at the beginning of the speech. The presentation was clear and funny at the same time. I think that he would be a good instructor because he was clear and he answered the student's and teacher's questions very well.

Nicholas Wright

I would most definitely take this instructor myself. Out of everyone there, I believe Nicholas was overall the best. I don't have any cons for him as he was able to answer every question thrown at him and was able to explain every point he made to the best detail. He was also very well informed about the concept of unemployment and all the factors that have an impact on unemployment. I would absolutely recommend this instructor to my friend as he was very coherent and was able to get his point across while avoiding extraneous words. I did follow his lecture material as it focused on unemployment and how it affects us, the thing that grasped me into me following him was his intrigue for the subject matter. He was very ecstatic to be presenting his ideas. I did understand the instructor and even though he had an accent this did not have any impact on my understanding of his lecture as he was fluid and had the perfect pace for his presentation. The presentation was very clear and concise as he was able to get through the slides properly while informing the people in class what each thing was and why it was prominent. An example of that would be when he was talking about the labor force. Nicholas would make an amazing instructor if he keeps on doing what he did in the presentation in class. All he has to do is be clear and concise and be able to answer all the questions thrown at him for any of the aspects he is focusing on.

Nicholas Wright-

Nicholas delivered a lecture on unemployment. He seemed prepared and had thorough slides to compliment his teaching of the subject. He had an accent, but he was very clear and understandable with his language, and presented the topic in an easy and simple way. Any questions he was asked he eagerly answered with great responses. I personally would take from this instructor, mainly because he seemed very interested in the subject that he was lecturing on. I probably would recommend this instructor to a friend for the same reasons that I would take from him. I did follow the lecture material very clearly, however Nicholas seemed to rely on the power point a bit too much. I am not sure how he would react if it were not functioning properly. Either way, the presentation was very clear and understandable. Any definitions that were presented were defined clearly and concisely. Overall I think Nicholas could be a good instructor, at the end of the lecture I felt like I had learned more about unemployment, the labor force, and labor force participation rates than I had known before.

Nicholas Wright

Mr. Wright struck me as a little boring in his presentation. He was not engaging nor was his presentation inviting. I personally would not take his course, due to my inability to focus in a very monotone lecture class setting. I would not recommend him to a friend either, due to the lack of engagement and liveliness. I did follow his lecture material, though it was unclear at times but Mr. Wright was difficult to understand at times, jumbling together different facts making them unclear. Mr. Wright did not appear to have enough knowledge or preparation for his presentation and therefore I do not believe he would make a good instructor.

Nicholas Wright (Macroeconomics: introduction to unemployment)

This presenter was the best one I had seen so far, He was very clear from the start what we will learn, what we will have already be expected to know, the general rubric, the objectives, and instructions for the lecture. His powerpower and presentation was very clear and structured. He was also extremely engaging, any questions thrown at him was already answered or about to be answered later in the slides. I was able to follow the lecture material and understand him because of his tone of voice and mannerism. No erratic movements, very confident, very vocal, as well as thoughtful. His presentation was very clear, he explained concepts that may be important that were not necessarily relevant at the moment, vague concepts, as well as the differences between labor force classifications with ease and precision. He was able to talk fluently without tripping up. Even with questions he was extremely prepared and was able to answer them with factual clarity. In addition, he was able to bring in information from other countries, bringing an increasingly broader perspective into the subject. He did not miss any bases, and to an extent, answered questions as though he anticipated them beforehand. He was able to engage the classroom in a way that didn't already assume people already knew the subject, or in a way that people would have to be committed to that example the whole class. He was flexible as a teacher and I would not hesitate to take him as an instructor, he is an excellent one and I would recommend him to my friend as well.

Nicholas Wright

Mr. Wright presented his lecture at eleven thirty on Friday and spoke on his topic of unemployment. I realized that I would not be able to take this instructor because he did not capture or hold my attention. I did notice he got along with the crowd well and I could understand him despite his accent which did not hinder his speech. I would not recommend him to a friend because I know they would be as bored as I was. Yes, I did follow the material a little bit although at some point I got lost and just waited for him to get back to another thing I would understand and I did understand him clearly because his content was easy to understand. He asked questions of the crowd and made sure they participated. His presentation was clear but with me it seemed it was mostly his inability to keep my attention. I rather like teachers who talk loud enough and it will immediately make you look up and see what is going on. Other times, if many people are participating, it would be enough to make me pay attention and although people did answer questions, I just was not interested. He seemed to have good humor that the audience appreciated and when asked questions, he would let them know that it was coming up in another side and politely ask them to wait. I believe he would make a good instructor because although, his teaching style was not for me, it might appeal to another person.

Nicholas Wright

I would take Nicholas Wright as my instructor. Nicholas was very calm and confident speaking in front of the class. It was obvious Nicholas knew the material that he had come to present. I would recommend him to a friend because he was very thorough with his responses to questions and allowed them to fit naturally in the lecture without stopping to jump to answer a question that would be presented regardless. Nicholas spoke very clearly and had an easy to understand presentation that went along with his material. Everything was well done and I think Nicholas would make a great instructor.

4th Session Attended: Nicholas Wright

The topic of this session was “Unemployment.” In my opinion, of the four sessions I attended, this was definitely the best. He was from another country and had a thick accent, but he spoke very clearly and I could understand him throughout the presentation. His introduction was very well done and clear, but maybe a little too long for a thirty minute presentation. The set up and organization of his PowerPoint was great, but he depended a little too heavily on it. Almost everything he said was read directly from the PowerPoint. He sounded like he knew what he was talking about and answered a lot of questions nicely. I asked him a question (I was 15 when I started my first job, would I be considered employed or not a part of the labor force?). Though he wasn't exactly sure about the answer, he was able to infer possible answers. He didn't get through his entire presentation (because presentations were a little off schedule, and also his introduction was longer than necessary), but I think he did a great job with what he went through. I think I would consider taking this instructor and/or recommending him. I think he would be an okay instructor.

Nicohlas Wright

I would most likely choose Nicolas as an instructor I liked the way he presented his presentation on Unemployment. I would recommend him to a friend because I feel confident that if I was to recommend him and they were to take him as an instructor they would understand the material that he presents. The only thing I was a little skeptical about was that he didn't really answer certain questions that was being asked, but I believe that can be fixed with just a little practice on how to be straightforward when answering questions and not being too wordy with an answer. I did understand the instructor and I actually liked the fact that he made us interact we didn't just sit there and listen to him talk. He asked questions that made us want to participate. I did understand the instructor and what he was teaching it was clear and made me understand the ways unemployment cause effect the economy good or bad and how we can fix it and who was considered unemployed. His presentation was clear, the PowerPoint showed everything that he was talking about and he would just elaborate on the topics in the PowerPoint. I also liked the fact that when questioned were asked he was clear with his answer and he would make sure that we understood his answer and if we didn't he would make sure we did before moving on to the next topic. I believe that he would be a good instructor being that he did all the things that I like in a professor / instructor.

Instructor name: Nicholas Wright

Nicholas was the best one I saw in my 2 hour stay, hands down. He was completely relaxed, confident, and he knew the material. When asked questions, he would have the correct response. And if he did not know the answer to a question, he would give an educated guess, which would turn out correct as well. I would definitely take this instructor myself if I could. He seemed like he had taught lessons before, and knew his way around explaining things. I would definitely recommend this instructor to a friend if they were to take something he was teaching. I was able to follow his lecture material pretty well, and he not only gave information about the United States, he branched out and gave facts about other countries as well. This was a very important part. He was able to connect the lesson with real-life situations as well, which gave the lesson more depth. I understood everything he said. The presentation itself was clear and he even with technical difficulties he was able to successfully provide a good lesson. He was not only charismatic, he had a sense of calmness that could rub off on students, allowing them to be able to pick up information better. Even though I already knew the information he was teaching, I felt like I was learning it all over again because of how well his lesson was going. I believe he would be a very strong candidate for being an instructor.
